

Temple on the Move, Part 2

It's probably a bad thing in context, i.e., the Pauline verse that says "...always learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth", but in the context of our current cultural environment, is that quote necessarily a negative?

As it was highlighted in Temple on the Move, Part 1, each individual believer is imbued with the indwelling of the Holy Spirit and it was suggested that this promotes diversity, not uniformity of thought. Which means over the course of the millennia since the Holy Spirit was given to humans, a plethora of ideas about God, Christ, etc. have been thrown against the wall, many of them sticking, many of them dropping to the floor where they were unceremoniously stamped upon.

But the positive aspect of "... always learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth" is that we are all searchers and as they say, the journey is sometimes more important than the destination.
